(ISOA Note: Overwhelming visual similarity with Edmond Nathaniel Denton of Monaco “Per bend Azure and Gules, a fess Counterchanged fimbriated Or.” Though there exists two theoretical points of difference in the “Per bend” and Counterchanging, the overall effect is too visually similar. The addition of a charge or use of a different ordinary, such as a pale, would clear this conflict.)

Marshaling is defined, per the heraldry manual as “Any design wherein the field is divided Per Bend, Per Chevron, Per Fess, Per Pale, Quarterly, Per Saltire, or any variations thereof (such as “Inverted”), wherein the charges on either side of the line of division are of different types.”)*

RULING:

In the LoRR of August, 2014, I held over the submission from Agnes Rosenberg of Constantinople. This month, I registered the submission.

The reason for the holdover had to do with the use of a charged tierce. The tierce, unlike ordinaries such as the chief or fess, is more rarely seen in period armory. Though rare, when it does appear it is usually left uncharged. Examples from period are hard to come by, but when they appear they tend to support the “uncharged tierce” tradition, with only one example found of a charged tierce. In that instance, the tierce is charged with a fess, which acts as a charge in the absence of other charges. (See examples on the next page.)

However, even with this in mind, I found that there still remained a simple question of whether it could be charged. While some ordinaries, by sheer size and design, cannot be charged (i.e. Orle, Double Tressure), I could see no size impediments which would disallow charging of a tierce.

Additionally, there is the problem of the appearance of marshaling. A charged tierce, if drawn too large, could become confused with a “per pale”

c.1475-1475 Armorial et Traité d'Héraldique
FRANCAIS 24381

1550-1555 *Insignia
Neapolitanorum, Genuensium*

division in which different charges appear on opposite sides of the line of division. Any such use of “per pale” is marshaling and is disallowed in Adrian heraldry.

The problem with that line of thinking is that, if the ultimate argument stems from “it could be drawn to large,” then the College would have to apply the same standard to a charged chief.

Both the chief and the tierce utilize one-fifth to one-third the total area of the field. Both the chief and the tierce could be drawn too large and create the illusion of marshaling (“per fess” and “per pale,” respectively). So, if we allow a charged chief, what argument could be made to disallow a charged tierce?

It is with that in mind that I issue the following decision:

A charged tierce shall be allowed in Adrian heraldry. It shall be treated, for the purposes of rules and restrictions, under the same guidelines as a chief.

With that said, I do wish to issue some recommendations. Given that tierces were primarily uncharged in period armory, and that the tierce itself is a late-period ordinary, it is recommended to leave a tierce uncharged in Adrian heraldry. Should a submitter wish to charge a tierce, they are highly encouraged to be careful with display so as to not make the tierce too large and give the appearance of marshaling.

This ruling shall be effective with the publication of this Letter of Registration and Return.
